AMERICAN IDIOM OF THE MONTH

"Down to the wire"

Meaning:

Close to the deadline; working until the last possible minute to finish a task, often in a tense environment unsure of your ability to finish on time

Origin:

The phrase “down to the wire” comes from the sport of horse racing. In the 19th century, American race tracks would string a wire across the finish line. In highly competitive races where two or more horses were all very close at the end, the race was said to come “down to the wire” – that is, whichever horse crossed the wire first was the winner. Over the years, the phrase was adapted into everyday conversation and took on a more general use, referring to tense situations or close competitions where the results are not known until the very last minute. In business, it is often used to refer to upcoming deadlines, particularly when teams have to work up until the very last minute to finish an assigned project.

Example:

Natalia’s make-up date with Franklin was in half an hour, but she was only halfway done with her report and it had to be on her boss’s desk before she could leave for the day. This one was really coming down to the wire.
